

CIO OFFICE MORNING MARKET WRAP 30 April 2025

Despite the slowing economy and the outlook clouded by high tariffs markets continued to rebound against a lower volatility backdrop, showing a shorter-term bullish bias. Investors shrugged off a dismal consumer confidence reading and falling labor demand to push the S&P 500 (+0.6%) past key resistance levels, while the Nasdaq (+0.8%)came close to retracing all the losses since April 2 Liberation Day. In an old-economy revival financials and materials lead broader gains, with all sectors in the green except energy. Meanwhile, Treasuries continued to advance, with the yield on the 10-year note falling below 4.2%, the US dollar rebounding against all major currencies from still oversold levels, and gold slipping further on peak trade uncertainty. Despite the disinflationary conditions indicated by the elevated level of Fed funds rates versus core CPI, chair Powell is focusing more on the outlook for higher price pressures to still maintain tight financial conditions. Markets do not believe he'll be able to hold out for long and continue to see a bit less than four cuts for the year starting at latest from July. No high-debt economy can sustain high real rates for long, never mind official messages to the contrary. Tariff angst in the real economy was evident in the ballooning March trade deficit, that at $162bn showed a scramble for still cheaper goods ahead of implementation of trade levies. Although the public narrative puts down the current rally to the Fear of Missing Out, or to the now higher odds of policy easing, investors may rather just be looking through the current high tariff rates anticipating that they will somehow be rolled back just enough and just in time. President Trump cannot afford to keep this level of pressure for long without voters and political allies revolting, as highlighted by the falling approval ratings the media outlets continue to advertise. Morgan Stanley for instance worked out a probable scenario whereby the two major superpowers would reduce levies on China imports to 60% by Q2, and to 34% by the end of 2025. Yes, negotiations will be complex, meantime we judge the Fed would somehow be stepping in to help, and attention would shift to tax cuts and deregulation, with a much better mix for investors versus discounting it all by looking ahead and ahead in the face of actually nothing real happening now. Bottom line, the US market should be range bound for some time.

And now let's look into macro data, that is seemingly taking more than a backseat as against Trump's policies, but that actually poses an obvious constraint for them. In a no-surprise release Conference Board consumer confidence weakness echoed the dismal reading in last week's University of Michigan survey. And rightly so, as Trump's super-high-stakes stance is not sustainable for long, as already mentioned. The JOLTS labor survey for March was more neutral, pointing to lower labor demand even as hiring was still steady. It should be echoed by the jobs report this Friday, with April non-farm payrolls expected to fall towards the still healthy level of 130,000. Bottom line, US hard data is still holding up nicely. And if US economists have not much reason to smile when they look ahead, even less do the ones in Europe. ECB President Lagarde said the process of reaching the 2% target of inflation is "nearing completion". One wonders if completion was rather achieved by Trump, given the demand shock of tariffs to European companies. As per this coming Friday's data, euro area CPI should grow at 2.1% versus a year ago. Unsurprisingly, longer-term inflation expectations reported by the ECB remained well-anchored. And as unsurprisingly, the European Union made tangible offers to the Trump administration, to "bring the stability back" , as per bloc commissioner for internal partnerships Jozef Sikela. In the end, deep rifts or not, most US allies offered olive branches to the unwelcome disruptor. And although China is putting up a stern face to tariffs, Morgan Stanley sees the CNY1-1.5tn stimulus package to be introduced in the latter half of the year ad insufficient to tackle the Trump's shock. Bottom line: the high-stakes game of the unwelcome disruptor is bringing everybody to the negotiating table, and for a reason.

Markets this morning:

Stocks are off to a bad start in the morning session. US futures both for the Nasdaq and the S&P 500 were down at least 0.6% in the wake of bad after-market results by Super Micro Computer that plunged 15%. Asian shares pared earlier gains, while business confidence surveys in China showed a stagnating economy. According to the official PMIs factory activity contracted, and services expanded very modestly, with the offshore yuan edging lower after the release. Shares in Samsung Electronics fell on a roughly 40% drop reported for its chip business following US export controls. And in the latest pivot to his strategy, President Trump signed an executive order easing the impact of his auto tariffs, so that duties on foreign-made vehicles would not layer up on other levies, and lessening charges on parts used to make vehicles in the US. Economists surveyed by Bloomberg see US Q1 GDP growth to be released today cooling to a standstill.

Upcoming key events/data:

The macro highlights for today will be Q1 GDP in the United States and the Eurozone. And all eyes will be on Microsoft and Meta Platforms' Q1 results.
