

CIO Office Morning Notes

1 April 2026

Markets finally got the kind of rebound that had been trying to happen for days, but it was very clearly a relief move rather than a clean all-clear. After weeks of being battered by every twist in the conflict narrative, even a modest shift in tone was enough to spark a sharp snapback, with the MSCI ACWI up 1.9%, developed markets up 2.3% and the S&P 500 surging 2.9%. What really drove it was the sudden market belief that the conflict may not drag on indefinitely, after Trump said the US could leave within two to three weeks and appeared to lower the bar for what would count as an exit. That gave markets something they had been desperate for, which was not resolution, but at least a possible end point.

That change in mood came through most clearly in the US, where equities delivered their strongest day in months and the rally was broad enough to show just how defensive positioning had become beforehand. The Dow jumped more than 1,100 points, the Nasdaq rose 3.8%, airlines and travel stocks rebounded hard as oil eased intraday, and bond yields moved lower again with the 10-year Treasury ending at 4.32%. The move in rates mattered because it gave growth stocks more room to run, and tech did a lot of the heavy lifting. Nvidia rose strongly after unveiling a $2 billion investment in Marvell, which sent Marvell up sharply as well, and there was also a flood of corporate activity that helped reinforce the idea that markets are still willing to reward long-duration growth and dealmaking when the macro pressure eases even slightly. Eli Lilly moved on Centessa, Biogen struck a deal for Apellis, and Unilever agreed to combine its food business with McCormick in a $44.8 billion transaction, which pulled Unilever lower but added to the sense that large corporates are still moving ahead rather than freezing completely.

The bigger point though is that the rally was driven by hope around the conflict rather than by any real improvement in the underlying shock. Trump is still talking about leaving within weeks, there is a national address now scheduled, and he has signaled that reopening Hormuz may not be a precondition for ending the campaign. That is where the contradiction sits. Markets liked the idea of US withdrawal, but the actual energy disruption is still not resolved, and that is why even on a strong day for equities, Brent still rose 4.9% to $118.4 per barrel and gold jumped 3.5% to $4,668 an ounce. The dollar fell 0.6%, which also helped risk assets, but the more important reality is that commodities are still telling you the supply shock remains alive.

In the US, consumer confidence rose unexpectedly to 91.8, but it was not an especially reassuring report because expectations for the next six months softened and inflation expectations rose as households increasingly pointed to oil, gas and the conflict as the issue. Job openings also fell to 6.88 million and hiring slowed to the weakest pace since 2020, which fits with a labor market that was already cooling before the latest energy shock hit. So on one hand markets got a growth-friendly combination of lower yields and slightly better current sentiment, but on the other hand the economy still looks softer underneath, with companies becoming more cautious and households still feeling the pressure of rising costs.

Europe held up, with MSCI Europe up 0.4%, but it was not nearly as strong as the US and the region still looks much more exposed to the stagflation side of the story. Eurozone inflation jumped to 2.5% in March from 1.9%, the biggest rise since 2022, almost entirely because of energy, and that has pushed the ECB back into a much more difficult position. Core inflation actually eased, which matters, but the headline move was enough to keep rate hike expectations alive and leave the region facing both weaker growth and a renewed inflation pulse. Asia was where the damage from the past month still looked most visible. The region had already just gone through its worst month since 2008, and even though some markets tried to stabilize, the pressure from oil and growth worries has not gone away. Japan's TOPIX fell another 1.3% and the monthly decline was the steepest since 2008, with AI-related industrials, chip gear names and trading houses among the biggest drags. In China, the headline equity move was smaller, with MSCI China down 0.3%, but the internal story is more mixed than that. Official manufacturing data improved and moved back into expansion, yet private surveys showed smaller exporters are already feeling a real squeeze from higher freight, fuel and supply chain disruption. Input costs have risen at the fastest pace since 2022, suppliers' delivery times are lengthening again and the firms most exposed to global trade are seeing a much tougher environment than the official numbers alone would suggest.

There were also a few structural stories worth watching because they tell you where capital is still flowing despite the macro noise. OpenAI closed a massive $122 billion funding round at an $852 billion valuation, with Amazon, Nvidia and SoftBank leading the financing, which is another reminder that the AI capital cycle is not slowing down even in a more volatile market. In parallel, Microsoft is now in exclusive talks with Chevron and Engine No. 1 on a giant natural gas power project in West Texas to support AI data center demand, which says a lot about how the next stage of the AI buildout is becoming directly tied to securing reliable energy. Greece also got upgraded by MSCI back to developed market status, which is symbolically important and another sign of how benchmark flows and regional index composition are still shifting even while macro markets are being pushed around by war headlines.

Markets this morning:

Today morning, the relief tone is extending in Asia, where equities are rebounding strongly after their worst month in over 17 years, with the MSCI Asia Pacific index up around 4% and technology stocks leading with gains of more than 6%. Futures in the US and Europe are also pointing higher, while the dollar is edging lower and bond yields continue to drift down. The move is still tied to the same driver, expectations that the US could exit the conflict within weeks, but there is already some hesitation in how it is being received, oil remains above $100, the Strait of Hormuz is still unresolved, and there are even reports of further military positioning in the region. So while the market is clearly willing to lean into the idea of de-escalation, it is still operating without confirmation that the underlying disruption is actually being removed.

Upcoming key events/data:

Looking ahead key events and data today include US ISM manufacturing, ADP employment and retail sales, together with eurozone manufacturing data and Japan's Tankan survey. Thursday moves to US jobless claims and trade data, Japan monetary base and South Korea inflation, while the ECB publishes its economic bulletin. Friday rounds things off with the US jobs report, where payroll growth around 55,000 is expected, alongside unemployment and services activity, as well as China services PMIs and French industrial production, which should give a clearer read on how growth is holding up as energy pressures build.

Have a good day!
