

CIO Office Morning Notes

16 February 2026

We are living in fascinating times. Technology, economy, and finance are merging into one single mega force which impacts everything, from energy and resources to policies and geopolitics. This is a key topic of our Global Outlook publication and roadshow, titled “Eyes Wide Open” where we highlight the need for vigilance and selectivity.

Last week was thus unsurprisingly volatile and differentiating. It ended well however, as most asset classes delivered positive dollar returns, helped by a -0.7% average depreciation of America’s currency. Stocks from emerging markets and global listed real estate gained over +3%, closely followed by gold at +1.6%, while stocks from developed markets were slightly lower. The US fell -1.4%, offsetting the impact of a +6% rally in Japan driven by political winds of change. The fixed income asset class was sought after: US Treasury yields fell between -8 and -15 basis points on all tenors above 2 years. The 10-year closed at 4.04%, its lowest level of 2026 and almost at our year-end fair value. Brent prices were stable around $67.8 and silver struggled to rebound, closing at $77.4 before an important week (more on that below).

Key data release was the US NFP labor report, which surprised to the upside in January with 130k job creations, twice the median forecast. Cyclical assets were pleased to see the unemployment rate unexpectedly drop from 4.4% to 4.3%. Alas, the US Bureau of Labor Statistics had more to say: a drastic revision of previous releases, which subtracted hundreds of thousands of job creations from 2025 alone. US CPI inflation for January, released on Friday, came in at a slightly better than expected +2.4% year-over-year at the headline level, and in line with expectations on core at +2.5%. If you combine that with the objectively positive leading indicators from the previous week, we have a picture of solid growth, without price pressure, and without hiring. This looks like what we could expect from an AI-driven transformation, doesn’t it? Indeed, technology and economy are merging, and stock markets last week were all about that. The global sector hierarchy was unambiguously led by the winners of the AI buildup, from energy and materials to utilities and industrials. Then, there were big losers: to some extent the hyper-spenders (aka hyperscalers), but also companies whose business model is the most vulnerable to AI across services, especially some financials. Consumer discretionary was also down while staples were up. Indeed, as we often highlight, machines are great workers, but they won’t consume the same things as the white-collars they may replace. This is definitely a time to keep our eyes wide open in a volatile and nuanced world. Against this complex backdrop, the Fed’s decisions will be both crucial and difficult to predict. Last week, markets’ implied expectations moved slightly closer to our forecast of 3x25bps cuts this year.

Markets this morning:

The Lunar New Year holidays have started: China’s onshore markets and Korea are closed, while trading will shut early in Hong-Kong and Singapore. In Japan, stocks are down -0.3%, the yen is slightly down and bond yields marginally lower after Q4 GDP came out much weaker than expected at only +0.2% annualized over Q3, while inflation from the same report was slightly faster than forecast. Prime Minister Takaichi will officially meet with the BoJ Governor today. Gold is down $50 to just below $5,000; silver falls -2.7% to $75.3 and bitcoin struggles at $68,200.

Upcoming key events/data:

Let’s start with a word on silver, where two factors combine to predict another episode of volatility in the very near term. First and crucially, Shanghai Futures Exchange is closed for days: this is the world’s second most active market, China controls a massive portion of the world’s refined silver and has recently implemented export restrictions on the metal and margin requirements for speculation, in what can be perceived as a move to counter potential attempts at pressuring prices. New York’s COMEX will be sole in charge during the holiday, and the first notice date on their March future contract is in less than two weeks. With an open interest of over 400mn ounces in “paper silver”, which compares to around 100mn ounces of actual metal in registered inventory available for delivery, one can reasonably assume that some market participants could allegedly want lower prices. The unknown is of course how many contracts will be simply rolled over and what actual delivery will be requested. Some inventory could also be added to the registered bucket if needed. It may be just fine, but it may be very volatile. Risks and opportunities - be vigilant with any tactical position on silver.

Back to business as usual: the week ahead will provide the Empire manufacturing index, industrial production, and Q4 GDP for the US, as well as flash PMIs for all regions. Q4 corporate earnings will continue as we are currently 2/3 into the season. On geopolitics, talks will resume between Ukraine and Russia, and between the US and Iran. The EU is expected to sign a trade deal with Australia while several heads of states should meet at the AI Impact Summit in India. President Trump will also host his “Board of Peace” meeting on Gaza.

Have a great week.
