

CIO OFFICE MORNING MARKET WRAP – 27th July, 2022.

Extreme volatility continues. Tuesday started well in Asia, turned mixed in Europe and ended badly in the US, before some post-market good news lifted future contracts. On net, stocks fell -0.1% in emerging regions but -0.5% in developed ones, with the US closing at -1.2%. Treasury yields were steady across the curve, with the 2-year at 3.04% and the 10-year at 2.81%. The price of Brent crude oil had a wild session: it traded sharply up most of the day, around $107, due to Gazprom reducing its gas deliveries to Europe, before suddenly dropping to $104 when the Biden administration announced it would release even more oil from their strategic reserve. The dollar ended the day +0.3% stronger against its trade-weighted counterparts.

Among the avalanche of market moving news, we will highlight the following. First, recession risk is increasing, with Europe in particular facing a perfect storm. Monetary tightening has started, Italy is in political transition and the cost of the solidarity with Ukraine is a major energy crisis. Following Gazprom's move yesterday, natural gas jumped another 15% – its current price expressed in crude oil barrel equivalent is close to a multiple of three. The direct consequence is that electricity prices are at their all-time high for Germany and France. The EU has agreed on a plan to reduce its dependency but in the meantime, it's a severe pain for households, industries and businesses. Recession risk was also highlighted, without any surprise, by the IMF in their world economic outlook update released last night. Growth forecast is cut to 3.2% in 2022, which compares to 3.6% in their April report and 4.4% in January. Seeing the institution make three cuts in 7 months goes a long way in illustrating the “low visibility” theme we highlighted for 2022. The IMF’s Chief Economist added in a blog accompanying the release that “the world may soon be teetering on the edge of a global recession, only two years after the last one”. Let’s conclude on this by adding that their forecast for global growth in 2023 is 2.9%, but let’s keep in mind that the IMF has never been known for their optimism, and not always for the accuracy of their predictions. Still, it’s another indication of a darkening macro backdrop.

The other set of important news came of course from an extremely rich day of corporate earnings. We would briefly highlight a selection of names. UBS profit missed estimates due to client outflows and compliance cases. By contrast, H1 sales from LVMH soared, well above forecast, despite China headwinds. Contrast again, Adidas issued a profit warnings precisely due to China’s Covid restrictions. Unilever was reassuring with a solid set of first-half numbers, from the top to the bottom-line. McDonalds beat sales estimates, with significant price hikes. Another positive reading came from Visa which topped both sales and earnings expectations thanks to a surge in overseas spending. Now on big tech: Microsoft didn’t just had a very positive quarter, they also raised their forecast for the year, now expecting double-digit growth on both. Very impressive indeed. Texas Instruments also had an upbeat forecast, and Alphabet, the parent company of Google, came with a solid Q2 showing resilience in advertising revenues.

Most of the good news came after the US close, which boosted US equity futures – currently +0.8% higher than when cash markets closed yesterday. This overnight optimism however doesn’t translate to Asian markets. As we write, stocks are modestly up in Japan, helped by a strong dollar, but down -0.5% in Korea and China, and -1.5% in Hong-Kong. There is no notable move in interest rates and energy.

Today is FOMC day – the rate decision from the Fed will be announced at 10 PM Dubai time. A 75 basis-point hike has been widely telegraphed, but markets will focus on projections, and look for hints about how the Fed perceives, and most importantly integrates, the recessionary pressure its fight against inflation creates. We will also look at consumer confidence in France, Germany and Italy. It’s another rich day for corporate earnings on both sides of the Atlantic. Among others, Meta/Facebook, Credit Suisse, Boeing, Airbus, Mercedes-Benz and Carrefour will publish their numbers.

Please note that our daily investment notes will take a break in August. Stay safe.
